

Olga Malkova is an Assistant Professor of Economics at the University of Kentucky and a Research Affiliate of the Institute of Labor Economics (IZA). She completed her Ph.D. in the Department of Economics at the University of Michigan. Her research focuses on estimating the causal effects of social programs, particularly government transfers, across the life cycle. Dr. Malkova has studied the effects of family planning programs, short-term transfers immediately after childbirth, annual child credits, aid programs to reduce college costs, and pension benefits.
